

I am in support of universal public postal service in Canada.

I live in an Isolated part of our vast country. If the post office becomes deregulated it is possible that Canada Post would lose it's exclusive privilege for letter mail. I would really hate to start paying a higher rate for letter mail than Canadians living in more densely populated areas.

Canada Post is a very important social institution that is the very lifeblood for many people in rural and northern communities. The people of Canada bought and paid for Canada Post and it should continue to adhere to its public service mandate.

I work for Canada Post, but more often it's the profit that seems to be the main concern and not the public service.

I love my job and would like to feel I have some job security. However if Canada Post is deregulated, I strongly feel many jobs will become contracted out and ultimately public service will suffer because of it.

I believe there are ways to improve service and generate revenue to keep the post office self sustaining. Other changes can be made without deregulating our post office. I find that most customers don't know or understand how many of our services work or even exist.

We need to make Canada Post a more user friendly service. Keep it simple.

Thank you for your time and consideration.

Tanya Hicks
Yellowknife Northwest Territories.