

Mail is an essential service as a base level means of communication for people across the country. As a country, a sovereign country?, certain services should be free from the ravages of large market competitors and their profit imperatives.

Certain provisions are best left in the realm of government service, such as education, health care, transportation, public works, and the means of communication. These are essential services as they are demanded on a mass scale and thus work well as monopolies. As is evident, the demands of service and the demands of profit do not always coincide.

Thank you for taking my views into consideration,

Sincerely,

Nicole Parisi
BC